Following the launch of their new platform the AMEE MedEdPublish team would also like to announce their new theme: Humanities in Medical Education.

‘Medical humanities is an interdisciplinary field concerned with bringing the humanities back into medical practice and education and aims to improve our understanding of the total human condition in relation to health and illness and medicine and medical care. We firmly believe that it is presently one of the most important topics in medicine and medical education today, and are looking to bring together authors from as wide a scope as possible. We invite all authors interested in publishing their papers related to issues of the humanities and humanism in medical practice and education to submit their manuscripts for this special edition of AMEE MedEdPublish. We will be happy to read projects submitted not only by teachers and researchers but also by healthcare students. We believe that by presenting our projects together in one edition we make the importance of humanism clearly visible to all readers of MedEdPublish and we will also encourage all of them to join the community of medical educators, students and researchers involved in promoting the humanities.’

To ensure manuscripts are considered for inclusion in this quarterly themed issue, authors are encouraged to upload their manuscript through the online submission form between 1st July 2018 and the 31st of August 2018.
